

Video Report #3

In Tom Wujec's proposal, he praises the advancements made in technology and explains how it will impact the future. He states that technology has helped us better understand the world. He also tells how technological progressions have allowed us to effectively manipulate the world. Wujec proposes that a utopian future is on the horizon as technology will continue to advance, making humans more efficient and productive. He reveals that technology has progressed to a point where, soon, we will be able to plant a seed to grow a table.

In Nalo Hopkinson's proposal, she proposes that the future needs to be a better place. She points out that humans exhibit dual nature, especially when different cultures meet. She suggests that when different cultures meet, disparities can cause conflict between cultures, or they can be appreciated between cultures. Hopkinson proposes that humans need to be more generous and appreciative towards one another for the world to become a better place. Because it is inevitable that different cultures will encounter each other, putting aside differences and showing kindness toward one another will make the future a better place. Her proposal insinuates that those who opt for conflict rather than peace should be left out of the future.

I like Tom Wujec's proposal because I think that technology is very important for our future. Technology helps us do many things and thus, makes our lives easier. As technology gets better, so does the quality of our lives. His proposal also surprised me. I was surprised when he stated that, in the future, instead of growing trees and making tables, we will be able to plant seeds to grow tables. It is surreal that technology has come this far. On the other hand, I like Nalo Hopkinson's proposal because I agree with what she says. People have differences, but these differences shouldn't cause conflict. We should appreciate these differences and use them to connect with each other. If we want a better future, we must show each other kindness and generosity regardless of our differences.